SAFETY FIRST IN FEEDING

Two feeds that should be had with care by hog raisers are bran and cottonseed meal. The latter is all right for old hogs and grown shoats but young pigs sickened if it much is given. Cottonseed is poisonous, often to a fatal extent to all ages of hogs. I have known some men to feed it successfully. G. B. Hill, in Farm and Home, gave very little of it, and said it was risky, unless one had had experience with it.

There are two reasons why it is desirable to feed concentrated hog rations mixed with plenty of water, a sto make a thin slop. First, it has been proved both by experiment and practical observation that hogs do not take as much water as they need for full health, especially in winter when their water supply gets low. Giving a lot of it with their feed is handling and makes sure of their getting it. Second, it seems to be the nature of a hog to want feed that is only nutritious but filling. He balks out the feed and leaves the water with his digestive apparatus completely distended. It is best, of course, to give some bulky feed also, for same purpose.
